PLENARY SESSIONS

Frédéric Keck

Laboratoire d'anthropologie sociale, CNRS

Opening Plenary: June 9, 11.30 CEST

How to do an Ethnography of Preparedness
Including Non-Humans in the Anticipation of Pandemics

Biosecurity studies have traced the genealogy of techniques of preparedness from contemporary pandemics and natural disasters to Cold War anticipations of nuclear attacks. They have shown the transformations of these techniques, such as sentinels, simulations and stockpiling, as they apply to a generic threat with multiple beings. But how can we describe ethnographically the entanglements of these beings in an imaginary of future disasters? I will take the case of the surveillance of avian influenza in Hong Kong as it enrolls virologists and birdwatchers in the anticipation of pathogens crossing species borders. The situation of Hong Kong as a sentinel post at the borders with mainland China is a specific ethnographic scene, but I will ask how it can be extended to other sites of intense surveillance of early warning signals of future threats.

Avery Gordon

University of California, Santa Barbara & University of London

Closing Plenary: June 12, 15.00 CEST

The Hawthorn Archive and the Utopian Margins

The philosopher Ernst Bloch declared that “all given existence and being itself has utopian margins that surround actuality with real and objective possibility.” In this talk, I will describe the work of the Hawthorn Archive and its methodology, which invites consideration of the utopian margins where running away, marronage, vagrancy, rebellion, soldier desertion and other often illegible forms of escape, resistance, and alternative ways of life predominate.
